MASSIMODECARLO is pleased to announce Memento Mori, Jessie Homer French's first solo exhibition at Casa Corbellini-Wassermann in Milan. This retrospective marks French's return to Italy, following her debut at the Venice Biennale in The Milk of Dreams, curated by Cecilia Alemani. As with her previous works, French's paintings in Memento Mori are a lyrical exploration of the fragility and beauty of existence, conveyed through soft brushstrokes and a vibrant palette. Her familiarity with local bodies of water and the Californian wildfires is evident in each piece, creating a visual narrative that speaks to the power of nature and the human experience.

Immersed in the hilly San Jacinto Mountains, the self-taught artist Jessie Homer French depicts environmental catastrophes, blazing fires, shoals of fish and the inevitable death - the end of the world seems incredibly close yet somehow surreal when looking at French's work.

The American artist, blessed with a poetic eye and a deft hand, reminds us of the transience of life, capturing the fleeting moments of existence in a way that is both haunting and idyllic. Memento Mori is a celebration of mortality that seems not to comprise pain and grief but rather gentleness, an affection towards a dauntless nature that shelters us while reminding its inhabitants that we are just passing through.

French's work is deeply rooted in her experiences of the American and Canadian landscapes. She notes that these regions become her inner landscape and that it takes a while to internalise when she explores new terrains. Drawing inspiration from her surroundings, French often finds her paintings appearing as if in a dream or from old memories and found images. Symbolic and evocative, her works unfold like dreamlike but looming American scenarios, emphasising the precarious role of humans within them.

Among her works, fire is a recurrent subject. "I live in California - I would like to stop painting fire, but my world keeps burning", comments French. Referencing the heating-up planet and climate change, fire is a metaphor for nature's destructive power and the constant threat of natural disasters. It burns bright and fierce, illuminating the darkness and consuming everything in its path.

The apocalyptic and extremely contemporary scene in Spreading Fire portrays the crackling flames rising silently and spreading horizontally on the canvas. While wildfires continue to scorch French's canvases and California, the artist's work serves as a powerful call to action for climate justice as she highlights the devastating impact of human negligence.

Often depicting death and destruction – which usually comes in the aftermath of fires – the artist consistently challenges the viewer through the use of striking imagery, such as large numbers of deceased fish in pristine water or funerals with heavily adorned coffins that draw attention away from the bereaved. Despite the artist's realistic representation of these scenes, they possess an otherworldly and surreal quality that transports the viewer outside of their present reality and creates a sense of disorientation and awe.

At her solo exhibition at MASSIMODECARLO Milan, French's naïve and flat brushstrokes tell tales of a land steeped in memories and the ever-looming reminder of our own mortality. As her friend and fellow artist Joe Fay dubbed her, French is a master of "regional narrative painting," portraying the beauty of nature and the bittersweet inevitability of death coexisting in harmony.

Jessie Homer French

Jessie Homer French was born in New York in 1940. She currently lives and works in Mountain Center, California, US.

Jessie Homer French is an American painter and artist whose brushstrokes portray the natural landscapes of the Western United States. She delves into the themes of water, death and wildfires, painting a picture of the delicate balance between human actions and the fate of aquatic life and the environment. Her paintings feature intricate details and personal narratives, often drawing inspiration from her experiences as a fly-fisher and dweller in the desert mountains.
