kurimanzutto is pleased to present a new exhibition by Anri Sala.

In All of a Tremble¹, his second exhibition with the gallery, the artist explores the relationship between image construction and the physicality of sound. Situated across two opposite walls in the main gallery space, the works mechanize the process of synesthesia, the perceptual phenomenon in which stimulation of one sensory or cognitive pathway (in this case, image) induces an automatic, involuntary experience in a second sensory or cognitive pathway (here, sound). Sala materializes the shared intersectional limit between these two senses, locating meaning within this gap: the installation works audibility and visuality against each other to expose an altogether new sensory dimension found at their point of convergence.

The works All of a Tremble (Encounter II) and All of a Tremble (Delusion/Devolution) face each other in the gallery space producing images that take on cinematographic language: on one wall, two distinct floral motifs encounter each other, referencing a cut; while on the other, the pattern slowly recedes in a fade-out. Through a continuous rotation on its own axis, the needles of a wallpaper-printing cylinder streak against the needs of a metallic comb to produce musical notes and phrases, thus physicalizing the sound of the neighboring patterns. Across both walls, Sala exposes that very moment in which an image transforms into sound and a sound into image.

All of a Tremble continues Sala's fascination with repetition: like an echo that becomes a dynamic concept and constructs itself anew in different moments and spaces. In All of a Tremble, image and sound coexist interdependently with the patterns of one tracing the other. Sala develops a theory of fission and fusion by observing how opposing mediums work in conjunction through a process of sensory amalgamation. These works illustrate how sound becomes a means to investigate the relationship between form and formation, process and production, being and becoming.
