A common feeling grew out of a meeting between the New York gallery Murray Guy and gb agency, and is the realization of discussions between the galleries which identify with each other.

Attempts at building connections between them have given rise to a broader perspective for both galleries in the way they understand and communicate, and to each one's approach to art itself. We created links and potential arrangements of exhibitions before finally selecting one. In a few weeks the gallery in New York will offer different perspectives.

The exhibition reveals conceptual roots that remain strong even while its artists break free from the dogma and aesthetics of that movement. In individual and inventive ways, each one tests the boundaries.

A common feeling highlights the moment when the artist opens the door, welcoming the "other" into his work, underlining the point when this other takes part in the creative process; when it becomes both the starting point and the final destination; when the other is the trigger of a story, the omnipresent element around which all others orbit; when the work becomes a means for contextualizing and creates micro-events that promote propinquity.

In the same way, an exhibition will take place in Murray Guy, New York, from May 12 to June 30.
